

Bob Sallee's Notes

It is a great privilege to participate in this dedication. I would like to tell you a lot more about the men we are honoring today, but in 1949, we trained in four-man squads. Although you were a speaking acquaintance to most of the fellows, you only got to know people outside your squad if you were sent out on project work together.

Although first-year jumpers made seven practice jumps, those with previous experience only made two, and they were kept in separate barracks. So, we had very little opportunity to get to know them.

After training, we were sent out around the region on project work. Some together, in fairly large groups, piling brush and building trails. Sometimes 2 to 3 to augment a ranger district crew, and sometimes one alone.

In my case, in 1949, I was sent to the Canyon Ranger Station on the Clearwater to replace a man who had not reported for the trail maintenance crew. We spent most of the summer as regular Forest employees until Mother Nature sent a big lightning storm through the region. We were then called to Missoula as needed and dispatched to fires more or less in the order we arrived. In my case, except for Walt Rumsey, who was in my training squad when we were sent to Mann Gulch, the others were just speaking acquaintances.

I can't tell you about them personally, but I will try to tell you what kind of young men became smokejumpers. This was just after World War II, and a lot of returning veterans were still in college. The competition for jumper jobs was pretty intense. Earl Cooley and his staff were looking for young men in perfect health and athletic in a physical way, although the upper weight limit of 180 lbs. left out the big-time football and basketball players.

They wanted experience in the outdoors and, if possible, some previous firefighting experience. Many of the guys had either worked on blister rust contracts or in brush camps. I spent one summer in a blister rust camp and one summer on the Kaniksu white pine disease and stocking survey, and had been on several fires in the Kaniksu.

But most importantly, when they filled out the application and accepted the job offer, they demonstrated that they were young men who had decided to test their personal courage, face fear, and fulfill a need to stand out from the rest of the crowd.

When you are a boy growing up, you go through a series of steps to overcome fear. In the beginning, you are afraid of everything. One by one, they overcome these anxieties until they decide to put the question of courage aside forever. And there is no better way than jumping out of an airplane to convince yourself and show the world that you are not afraid.

But it isn't easy. The job application isn't too tough because you can always back out, and nobody else would know. But when the job offer arrives, you know this is for real. "If I keep on with this, I'm going to have to jump." You lie awake at night thinking about falling, and eventually, those who go on decide, "Yes, I can do it."

And after you report and stand up on the tower and look down at, at least a broken leg, you grit your teeth and jump just like all your buddies.

When you're kneeling in the doorway of the plane, looking down at little buildings, cattle, and trees, you think, "My God, am I really going to do this?" Another fear comes forth, and it dominates your being—the fear of facing your buddies if you don't jump again.

So when the spotter hits your leg, you jump, and it takes forever to fall the 20 feet or so to the end of your static line.

I can't describe to you the glorious feeling that goes with seeing that beautiful white canopy overhead and the exhilaration of knowing you have done it. When you reach the ground, the camaraderie with those who also jumped (in other words, conquered fear today) is overwhelming.

At that moment, you become one of an elite group consisting of all those who have jumped before. I won't tell you that there is no concern before the next or future jumps, but they are never like the first one. I hope I have given you insight into what it's like to become a smokejumper. There isn't any other experience like it.

In 1949, the parachute program was still feeling its way. But, it was a great success, and the proof of that is that it still exists and is needed over 50 years after the first fire jump. There aren't very many programs that can match that.

The smokejumping experience has benefited my life, and I think the lives of all program alumni. Jerry, Rob Linton, and I have talked about this at some length, and Rob put it best when he told me that after smokejumping, everything else was easy. He said even his stint in Korea wasn't as tough.

Bob Sallee's Notes

Smokejumping solidifies a courage that takes you through life. Nothing can ever be as difficult as stepping out that door the first time.

We hear a lot about teamwork in modern life, but there is no better lesson in teamwork than the one you get when checking your buddy's static lines and depending on him to check yours.

Jumpers have a highly developed determination and will to succeed. If you had ever seen a 140 lb. man carry 100 lbs. of fire pack and jump gear up a mountain to the trail because the terrain was too tough for a 1400 lb. mule, you would have an understanding of the word determination.

Participating with a crew of jumpers to build a fire line across the head of a fire before it blows is a study of the will to succeed.

Jerry Linton reminded me that we also come out of the program with a great respect for good health and physical stamina.

I could continue this until I had given the program credit for every desirable character trait known to man, and the program may deserve it. But for myself, I feel the most significant benefit was the belief in a day's work for a day's pay. This program teaches men that if you are given a job, do it and don't complain. If you don't want it, there are hundreds of others that do. There is no union to protect you. You stand on your own merits, and he who works hard succeeds in all things.

Again, I'm sorry I couldn't tell you more about the men we honor today. But I will say this: They were outstanding young men, selected from among the best, with proven courage, determined to succeed, and dedicated to doing the job assigned.

They gave their life trying, and this tribute is long overdue.
